Is Shea Witch?

Mrs. William Geiser, of Paterson, N. J., is a witch, some of her neighbors say, and has the power to blight a life with a glance of her eyes. Then she has the faculty of stealing vital power from the children of her acquaintances and transferring it to her own offspring, who are plump and flourishing. Four children and one cow have come under her spell, the superstitious assert.

Lewis street is in the outskirts of Paterson. It is a very seedy thoroughfare, and the very place which a cheer-less witch would probably select as a location for her charm and curse factory. The trains of the Erie Railway shrick past the house No. 228, in which Mrs. Geiser lives, and at night they might sound to the terrified like the cries of lost souls. When the dogs of Patterson have nowhere else to bark they go out to Mrs. Geiser's end of Lewis street and wail to their hearts' content, perfectly safe from interrup-tion, for the voters of that vicinity fear to put their noses out in the night air for purposes of remonstrance. No one in Paterson knew that witch-eraft was practised in the city limits until Mrs. Geiser herself marched into the police court, behind the City Hall, on Monday afternoon in a great state of mind. Justice Van Cleve was disposig of the cases of two drunkards just as the alleged witch stalked into the room, flourishing her umbrella and demanding justice. The magistrate gasped when he looked into the woman's eyes. She is slim and dark, forty years old and not at all good looking. She doesn't differ in ap-pearance from hundreds of Paterson women until you see her eyes. They are dark and piercing and she has a nervous affection that makes her keep blinking them in a way which the ignorant might think malevolent. Ever Justice Van Cleve turned from her and afterward he said, "I believe I'd have been mesmerized if she's stayed here a minute longer." The burden of the woman's tale was that Mrs. Sandford, a tenant in her house, was going about denouncing her as a witch, claiming that she had laid a spell on her boys, John and Henry Sandford, and irretrievably cursed Tom and Adrian Vrederburg, neighbors; an old cow belonging to the latter family had had her soul consigned to perdi tion, and, generally speaking, there

> The Justice promised to send a policemen to try and persuade Mrs. Sandford not to make any more trouble.

Just before the scene in the police court the Standfords moved out of the basement of the Geiser house and took up their quarters around the corner. When everything had been transferred they moved in a body upon Mrs. Geiser's home and told her that she was a personal friend of the devil.

"You have been killing my boys," Mrs. Sandford screamed. "You cursed them and the flesh has fallen from their bones, and there are big blotches on their skins which they scratch and tear at like little demons. You have hired an imp to choke them, and every night he clutches them by the throat.'

At this point in the narrative Mrs Geiser banged her door. But Peter Sandford, the boy's father, then took up the tirade, and the neighbors heard the whole story. Some of the women crossed themselves, but the more sensible told Sandford that he was an old
